Amazon Delivery Truck Accidents in New York

New York has seen an increase in delivery truck accidents as online shopping and home deliveries rise. Major carriers like Amazon are using more trucks to meet customer demand. But who is liable when a delivery driver gets into a crash? This is a complex issue that injury victims and companies must navigate carefully after a collision occurs. A New York truck accident lawyer is beneficial to have on your side as you navigate this overwhelming situation.

Determining Legal Responsibility

When an Amazon, UPS, FedEx, or other carrier truck hits a pedestrian or another vehicle, fault and liability are examined. Police reports, witness statements, surveillance footage, and more help establish what occurred.

If the delivery driver was speeding, ran a red light, or operated negligently, the driver and potentially their employer can bear responsibility. However, multiple parties may be at fault depending on the specifics of each truck wreck.

Amazon’s Role

In some accidents, injured pedestrians and motorists assume Amazon must pay for damages since their truck and brand were involved. But in reality, Amazon may contract with small fleets for deliveries. The driver may work for an independent company, limiting Amazon’s role.

This complex web of contractors and subcontractors makes knowing who victims should negotiate with or pursue in court after a crash complicated. An experienced New York accident attorney can help identify all potentially liable parties based on the accident circumstances.

Navigating Insurance Challenges

Delivery trucks must carry sufficient insurance to cover damages they cause on New York roads. But denied claims and disputes with insurers are common after a collision. The at-fault driver’s coverage may try to pay as little as possible, forcing victims to accept inadequate compensation or fight a difficult legal battle for what they deserve.

Powerful companies often pressure collision victims into quick settlements that benefit the corporation more than the injured person. Having a lawyer to deal with insurance issues after a truck wreck can help protect victims from unfair treatment.
