

PRACTICUM

According to John Donahue, chair of the sociology department, the practicum program will be undergoing its own review this year. With the aid of Professors Mary Dozier, Tucker Gibson, Donahue and Lindquist, Dean of Behavioral and Administrative Studies Stephen Tucker will coordinate an evaluation of sociology, psychology and political science practicums.

Donahue said that after sharing information with other departments, the sociology and anthropology department will form its own committee to review matters such as the grading procedure. Any changes recommended for the sociology program will be in place by next fall, he said.

Donahue said the hiring of four new staff members in his department makes the evaluation of the practicum program timely. "It is an appropriate time to do it with new input and new perspectives. It is time for review," he said.

STATEMENT

Statement defines many student rights but, "the board did not relinquish its authority." Calgaard said the Joint Statement remains "more protected by precedent than by legal process."

The question of whether the Joint Statement is binding on the president is currently being asked by some members of the SA and of the pub board. At a pub board meeting two weeks ago, Calgaard reminded the board members that the Joint Statement had never been approved by the Board of Trustees. Calgaard reiterated his desire for a prompt response to professor Sammie Johnson's report, which suggested a publications adviser. "I don't want to act unilaterally, but I will," Calgaard said.

Some students, including Livingston, have expressed the fear that statements like these could be suggest that Calgaard might violate the Joint Statement by acting against the wishes of the pub board. "You take a threat like that very seriously," Livingston said. "That kind of violation of the spirit of the Joint Statement would be very unsettling to the political climate."

Calgaard said he does not know why the Board of Trustees never formally adopted the statement, but that it remains administration's policy to respect the Joint Statement. "The administration has always acted upon it as if it were [ratified] and I do not anticipate a change in that attitude, or any change in policy."

give each other time to get to know one another again," Marks said.

Long-distance relationships bring their own set of advantages and disadvantages. Among the benefits students list security dependability and not having to put up with day-to-day annoyances. On the down side, students point out that such relationships can cause a person to live in the future or in another place, and that it is often difficult to deal with the lack of the physical reassurance.

There are many things one must do to maintain a relationship over distance, but the most difficult, according to Marks, is "You have to put yourself in a position of vulnerability. When you are in a relationship at Trinity, you can keep tabs on your partner. With the distance, you never know what's happening. You allow yourself to be hurt."
